America's Force Moral, Says Wilson at Luncheon

The President, addressing to-day the American Red Cross luncheon at the Mayflower, said:

"While the cause of America moral, and our influence on the future posture of nations, lies in our just, our moral, and our industrious men, yet our moral influence is more important than the mere physical power that may be used or might be used by the nation.

"The wrongs of the world, as to the future, lie in our just, our moral, and our industrious men. Our moral influence is more important than the mere physical power that may be used or might be used by the nation.

"The wrongs of the world, as to the future, lie in our just, our moral, and our industrious men. Our moral influence is more important than the mere physical power that may be used or might be used by the nation.

"The wrongs of the world, as to the future, lie in our just, our moral, and our industrious men. Our moral influence is more important than the mere physical power that may be used or might be used by the nation.

"The wrongs of the world, as to the future, lie in our just, our moral, and our industrious men. Our moral influence is more important than the mere physical power that may be used or might be used by the nation.

"The wrongs of the world, as to the future, lie in our just, our moral, and our industrious men. Our moral influence is more important than the mere physical power that may be used or might be used by the nation.