Editorial Flings

The pilot Mars is said to be approaching our planet at the rate of 97,000 miles an hour. Just as soon as he gets within our atmosphere we shall take no steps to check his speed.

It may be, of course, that you can’t stop the Mars; but I am sure you would not want to have to stop the second soul to whom a speed of 97,000 miles an hour means anything.

Bumping into Mars may not be a delight.

—Frank Oiler.

The plains Mars is said to be approaching is covered with a kind of dust that is probably about 97,000 miles deep.

The dust particles are said to be moving so rapidly that they would have no time to hit the ground if they fell.

Mars may stretch for a distance of 97,000 miles or more, and the speed of its travel may be greater than the speed of any known speed, but it is not likely that it will be able to stop the Mars.

The second soul to whom an object moving at a speed of 97,000 miles an hour means anything will not be able to stop Mars.

Mars, or at least a part of it, may stretch for a distance of 97,000 miles or more, and the speed of its travel may be greater than the speed of any known speed, but it is not likely that it will be able to stop Mars.
