In the Stovehole of the Modern Battleship, Where the Strain Is Greatest During a Sea Fight

Author of an Article on Engineering Problems, Has Seen Many of the Devices Which Aid in the Ship's Movement. In the picture, a section of a modern battleship is shown, with the attention directed to the mechanism of the ship's inner workings. The devices shown include various parts of the mechanical and electrical systems, such as propellers, engines, and navigational equipment. The author describes how these devices work together to operate the battleship efficiently and safely.
