"Duty Completed" And Our Victory Fleet Speeds Home

By William Hoster

When the great Atlantic fleet entered New York harbor last November and was greeted by hundreds of thousands of people, it was a striking demonstration of the power and prestige of the United States. The American people were proud of their country and of their navy, which had made the United States the leading naval power in the world.

The fleet consisted of thirty-two ships, including five battleships, ten cruisers, and seven destroyers. It was commanded by Admiral William D. Denison, who had been appointed to the post by President Theodore Roosevelt.

The fleet entered the harbor at 11:00 a.m., and the reception was热烈. The crowd of spectators lined the waterfront, cheering and waving flags as the ships passed by. The sight of the fleet was a magnificent spectacle, and it was clear that the American people were proud of their country and of their navy.

The fleet remained in New York harbor for two days, during which time it was open to the public for inspection. Many visitors came to see the ships, and it was a popular event. The fleet then sailed to Cape Cod, where it was joined by two battleships from the Pacific fleet, and the combined fleet sailed back to New York harbor, where it arrived on the 27th.

The Fleet Review was a great success, and it was a fitting tribute to the United States navy. The American people were proud of their country and of their navy, and they were grateful for the protection that it provided.

The review was followed by a grand naval pageant, which was held in New York harbor on the 28th. The pageant was a brilliant display of naval power, and it was a fitting conclusion to the Fleet Review. The American people were proud of their country and of their navy, and they were grateful for the protection that it provided.
