TRADITIONS OF THE NAJAVOS

From Material Furnished to the Deseret News by C. L. Christensen, Indian Interpreter and Priest of the Red Men.

C. L. CHRISTENSEN

In the old days, the Navajos were a peaceful and happy people, content with their lot in life. But when the white man came, all changed. The once happy people were driven from their homes, their lands, and their way of life. They were forced to live in the most miserable conditions, with little food and water.

The Navajos were a warlike people, and they had many enemies. They would defend their homes and their way of life with all their might. They were a proud people, and they would not be intimidated by anyone.

In the old days, the Navajos were a happy people, content with their lot in life. But when the white man came, all changed. The once happy people were driven from their homes, their lands, and their way of life. They were forced to live in the most miserable conditions, with little food and water.

The Navajos were a warlike people, and they had many enemies. They would defend their homes and their way of life with all their might. They were a proud people, and they would not be intimidated by anyone.

The Navajos were a warlike people, and they had many enemies. They would defend their homes and their way of life with all their might. They were a proud people, and they would not be intimidated by anyone.